ARTICLE I

The Purpose of Taxonomy

Preservation requires order.

Without a common structure, individual records accumulate, but the relationships between them are gradually lost.

The Archive preserves individual contributions.

The Taxonomy preserves the order through which those contributions may be understood in relation to one another.

The Archive therefore establishes a permanent taxonomy through which every contribution assumes its place and may be documented, recognized and preserved.

Each classification represents a distinct way in which enduring human excellence becomes visible.

Together, these classifications form the permanent structure of the Archive.

Representative objects may be established.

Contributors may change.

Records may grow.

The taxonomy remains constant.

Through this continuity, the Register preserves the coherence of the Archive across generations.
